The following rankings are formed in a 4-step process:

1. NFL Combine, Pro Day, and Draft Profile generated data are collected and inputted into position-specific algorithms for each player. The models then generate a score for every player who has completed enough requirements to be evaluated (roughly 80% of players invited to the 2022 NFL Combine).
 - Players who have most of the necessary data points but are missing a small amount are still evaluated using the mean result for that drill from that position.
2. Once each player is given a grade, the score assigns a player to different tiers in which players are then sorted by their projected draft position. For instance, out of the players given a first-round grade, players projected as consensus first-round picks will be ranked highest since the algorithms do not use a baseline of where a player is projected to be taken. This rearrangement accounts for missing or undervalued variables such as how a player performs on tape.
3. Additionally, if a player's grade borders between two tiers, and they are projected to be drafted significantly higher than a player in the previous grouping, a player can be moved slightly above someone in the next highest tier to account for the uncertainty in a fully statistics-based ranking system.
4. Finally, the twenty percent of players who have not completed enough drills to be ranked are slotted into the rankings based on the player's projected draft position. These players are denoted through a different color to acknowledge that they were unable to be evaluated.

Note: There are additional data points utilized in each of the models that are not shown in the following tables
